

THE BUZZ

PREFERRED BANKER Most early- to mid-stage start-ups typically put their monies into SVB accounts once they raise funding

| SILICON VALLEY BANK |

Bay Area's Black Swan Moment

Silicon Valley Bank, the darling of the tech ecosystem, has collapsed, leading to chaos. What lies ahead?

BY SOHINI MITTER

► FOR THE GLOBAL start-up and venture capital (VC) community, it was a chaotic weekend. After Silicon Valley Bank (SVB)—the trusted banking partner of the tech ecosystem—went down on March 10, with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) seizing its assets, scores of founders and investors who had hundreds of millions of dollars locked into deposits, scrambled to make sense of it all.

There was panic as immediate working capital concerns pinched start-ups all over the world. At least a dozen India-born SaaS unicorns—and several other B2B start-ups—are headquartered in the US and have subsidiaries elsewhere in the world. Most early- to mid-stage start-ups typically put all their monies into SVB accounts as

PHOTO BY GETTY IMAGES