JUST WHAT THE DOCTOR ORDERED

A little boy waited impatiently at a Doctor's clinic with his ailing grandmother. This Doctor was someone who was not that easy to access for families coming from a humble background. In fact, the wait for the appointment had also built up all the anticipation about this 'specialist' Doctor who could literally work his magic and cure patients. The little boy didn't really know what the word 'Specialist' meant, but it gave him an assurance that his grandmother would get well. Little did he know that the three hour wait at his clinic, would finally turn out to be futile when this Doctor would walk out, wearing a smug smile on his face and decide that he was done for the day. That he would ignore the long queue of patients waiting to see him because he could. The little kid never forgot the expression on the Doctor's face when he dismissively said, 'Aaj aur patients nahi dekh sakta.'

There's one more thing that the little boy didn't know. He didn't know that this incident would alter his life completely. The frustration, anger and disappointment that he had felt would become a creative force. And set him on a mission.

This was the day Dr. Satyajit Bose, that little boy who was waiting at the clinic, decided to be a conscientious doctor. And not stop at that. He made up his mind to develop a serious medical service that would never ignore something that is as basic as the access to healthcare. Something that would benefit a large ignored section of the society, where healthcare isn't available readily. He wanted to democratise it.
