

correction to come about, during which I hope to increase my equity allocation in the following years. I'm still a big proponent of equity investing, and it is as low as it is today because of the current valuations.

NS: My principals on savings, investment and spending aren't going to change in the next decade. I will still be frugal with spending and yet live comfortably. I will earmark a portion of my income for savings as well as charitable activities. I will invest 10 years down the line on the same principle as today, of long-term, regular and disciplined investments.

RG: As I mentioned earlier, I don't have a large allocation to metals but it is not a bad idea to allocate up to 5 per cent in these metals. I will think about adding the yellow metal to my portfolio, considering it has given better returns than the rising inflation and we have a fund called Edelweiss Gold and Silver ETF in the pipeline. I have a small exposure to AIFs. We are launching a private equity and growth equity fund in the AIF category, and I will probably have some exposure in one or two unlisted companies through that, and I am looking to grow that exposure over time. There will be no significant changes in the equity segment.

Q: How is your portfolio mix currently? How do you see it changing in the next 10 years?

NK: It's a combination of equity, fixed income, debt, gold and real estate, in that order. Equity is about 40 per cent; debt is 45 per cent; gold is 10 per cent; and real estate and alternatives constitute the remaining 5 per cent. With time, as valuations become less expensive, I would look to increase my equity exposure; having a higher equity allocation makes sense given the tax advantage, power of compounding, etc.

GOING FOR GOLD Radhika Gupta, MD & CEO of Edelweiss Asset Management, says she will think about adding the yellow metal to her portfolio

NS: My portfolio mix is tilted towards equity. I do have exposure across debt, equity, real estate and precious metals. As I grow old, my portfolio will transit from equity tilt to having a debt tilt.

RG: We are slightly conservative investors as both my husband and I work in the capital markets, which is a high-risk profession. I am largely consis-