am getting positive feedback that the second half of the year will be quite robust. That means some major economies like the US might get into some type of shallow recession, but after that, it would be back in action. I would say it is a promising situation," he said.

The impact of a global recession would be nominal in India as compared to other countries, Khara said, adding that the domestic demand scenario in India is quite encouraging. "Last quarter, we saw demand was as strong as 10 per cent. I expect a similar trend for the quarter ending December. I think our domestic side is doing pretty well. There is some sluggishness on the export side on account of recession fears and a slowdown seen in the developed markets. Once the advanced economies look up, the export lever will also see positive traction," he added.

The positive view on India's economic outlook was echoed by the International Monetary Fund's

First Deputy Managing Director Gita Gopinath, who said that India is in a relatively bright spot. "We have a tough year ahead in 2023. But we certainly are seeing signs of resilience around the world. In terms of a global recession, I think we are still a fair bit away from it—there are individual countries that are closer to a recession than others," she said, adding that compared to other countries, India is in a relatively a bright spot. "I think it is in a good place. And importantly, many
