

countries are looking at India [as an] investment destination at this point, especially as they try to diversify out of other countries, including China.”

It is not just Jindal’s electric ambitions—other Indian companies are also investing and preparing for a new growth cycle. Take for instance the Essar Group—that has been involved in the metals, mining, energy and infrastructure sectors. Having completed what it terms as the largest deleveraging exercise in Indian corporate history, the group is now investing in the same sectors, but with an environmental, social, and governance (ESG) investment mindset, says Prashant Ruia, Director, Essar Capital. “We went through a phase of deleveraging the group and monetising some of our assets. We deleveraged about $25 billion or about ₹2 lakh crore—which I believe is one of the largest corporate deleveragings in India—in less than five years,” he said.

HAVING DEALT WITH its mountain of debt, Ruia says the focus around the new investments is around the three themes of decarbonisation, decentralisation and digitisation. “We believe these themes are all going to define our future investments,” he said, adding that he believes India is in a sweet spot right now. “If you look at investment destinations globally, then I would say, India is right at the top. Obviously, China has fallen off a bit. From an international destination perspective, Europe is having a very difficult time because of the war in Ukraine. The Middle-east doesn’t really require significant investment because they are making tonnes of money, so they are making their own investments. So, if you think about the landscape globally, obviously the US remains strong, but within this part of the world, India is in a very sweet spot.”
