in Sriharikota. "This is the best time to launch a spacetech start-up in India. There is a clear business need, potential investors have realised its importance, and the government is willing to help," says Ravichandran.

As India gears up to become an economic powerhouse, the above examples illustrate how the country's business paradigm is transforming. In the post-pandemic period, India has not only managed to make a relatively quick recovery, but rising consumer demand has also managed to insulate it from the slowdown in most G20 economies. If the momentum is sustained, the country may touch GDP of $10 trillion by 2035, a study by the Centre of Economics and Business Research shows.

"India's economy is likely to be the world's third largest in dollar terms by the end of this decade," says Sanjeev Sanyal, Member of the Economic Advisory Council of the Prime Minister. "Our per capita income will still be below that of western countries, but I feel that in 25 years we will have ended absolute poverty, become the top exporter of goods and services to the world, made the energy transition, and taken our rightful place on the UN Security Council." Sanyal feels the country must continue to strive for the next cycle of reforms, particularly in administrative and judicial areas.

The last point is significant. Experts have continually urged for reforms in the bureaucratic and judicial processes to make India more lucrative. Before the World Bank discontinued its Ease of Doing Business rankings in 2021, the country stood at a lowly 163rd spot among
