care are not under the direct regulatory purview of IRDAI. It is for this reason that on April 13 this year the regulator issued a notice regarding Even Healthcare that offers health plans through monthly subscriptions. It advised people to note that they are dealing with the start-up at their own risk, and clarified that only IRDAI-registered insurance companies, or their appointed agents and intermediaries, can sell insurance products. The IRDAI did not respond to a request for comment.

Experts say that the space must be closely watched as it involves the collection of money from the public. Bhabatosh Mishra, Director of Underwriting and Claims at Niva Bupa Health Insurance, says, "The collection of money is a matter not just under insurance regulatory purview, it could be under the purview of the banking regulator as well. In anything of this nature where public money is collected, we need some safety net."

Onsurity's Agarwal disagrees. "As a healthcare membership platform, we have insurance companies providing us a Group Master Policy that is governed by IRDAI guidelines. This is similar to how companies like travel portals and banks provide bundled insurance with their offerings like tickets, or credit/debit cards. Similarly, our membership comes with group health insurance".

"IRDAI approves insurance companies. We're much more than that. But we do partner with IRDAI-approved companies to provide healthcare benefits with our plans," concurs Sen of Kenko Health.

"We have a managed-care model with a strong grievance redressal mechanism. And since we are an early-stage start-up, we take customer grievances very seriously. Also, IRDAI is thinking about creating a regulatory framework for managed-care models. We are working with IRDAI-approved insurers under its group insurance ambit where our subscribers can opt into a health insurance plan that they get as a group cover," says Clinikk's Kaur.

These new-age healthcare start-ups are bridging the gaps in the sector. However, there is a need for tighter regulations so that the interests of subscribers stay protected. BT
