Not surprisingly, the G20 agenda that India has set up for its presidency includes many topics rooted in its own national developmental priorities such as technological transformation and digital public infrastructure (DPI); progress on sustainable development goals (SDGs); green development and LiFE (Lifestyle For the Environment); and women-led development. It has also not shied away from taking up more challenging but pertinent issues such as reforming multilateral development banks (MDBs) and speedier resolution of debt stress faced by many vulnerable countries.

India has vast experience on many of these themes. For instance, it has been tackling economic issues such as leakages in subsidy distribution, financial inclusion and Covid-19 vaccination through innovative solutions based on DPI, including Aadhaar, Co-Win and the Unified Payments Interface (UPI). It believes these can

India is a world leader in developing and deploying digital public goods (DPG). The country has developed as many as 42 DPGs and deployed 49 of them
