expertise in DPI presents an opportunity to assist many other countries seeking to empower their people and provide benefits through best practices. The progress in this area is indeed going very well.

We are also willing to share our experiences... to connect the last mile, achieve a higher level of digital financial inclusion, and achieve the SDGs at a fast pace.

India's guiding theme of the G20 is 'Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam', or One Earth, One Family, One Future. How is this resonating with the global community? India's effort has centred on the pursuit of the global common good guided by the principles of human-centric globalisation as articulated by PM Modi. This principle underpins our approach to foreign relations, domestic development initiatives and engagements within the G20 forum. It is heartening to see that the rest of the G20 shares our commitment to these efforts. For instance, India has proposed embracing the 'Lifestyle for the Environment (LiFE)' movement that promotes sustainable consumption and production... which can only be achieved if sustainable practices are driven not by governments alone but by the people.

Now, how can we as a global community push this approach? Embracing concepts like a circular economy and waste-to-wealth, which have been ingrained in our tradition, has played a significant role in fostering a more sustainable lifestyle within our own country. Now, we aspire to extend these practices not only within our borders but also beyond them. This vision has largely been endorsed, reflecting the shared commitment towards a sustainable future.

What are the ideas that India is putting forward to reform the multilateral institutions?

Our focus lies in collaborating with the multilateral development banks to strengthen their mandates and enable them to meet the demands of the 21st century. While the IMF and the World Bank have performed reasonably well during their initial 50 years of existence, the challenges in the 21st century require enhanced capacity and mandate.

Our aim is to work with these international organisations and our G20 partners to enhance their mandates, enabling them to secure more financing and effectively assist indebted countries and emerging economies. This includes meeting present-day requirements, such as climate financing and other urgent needs. The significance of this objective is particularly pronounced from the Global South's perspective, given that approximately 60 per cent of the low-income countries are either debt distressed, or at a high risk of debt distress.

Our focus is on finding solutions through the G20 platform to elevate their situation and address their unique challenges effectively. It's crucial to ensure the active participation of all countries in these efforts, as each nation brings different ideologies and approaches to the table. This diversity can be a strength, but it is essential to foster inclusivity to achieve our shared objectives. Moreover, countries with a larger exposure to debt may have to
