

FOR THE SEEKERS of light that we all are, Gautam and Prateek of Klove Studio illuminate a new path of lighting design. The bulbous and often breathtakingly delicate blown glass shapes assimilate into grand light installations that break the glass ceiling of design and claim the wall space as art. Over the years the materiality and form of the lights (that is, if the mega, tinted-glass petalled chandeliers, complex feral foliage forms and atavistic totemic shapes can be called lights) has far exceeded their function to provide aesthetic luminance. They have instead become cynosure glass artworks for several corporate buildings, celebrity homes, public spaces and numerous art exhibitions. The Grasshopper light is unlike any other light in Klove Studio. The tortuous linear wood and metal light arms, inspired by the shape and kinesis of a grasshopper's legs, fold back into symmetrical oblong hand-blown glass bulbs, all placed horizontally at different levels to create a masterpiece of asymmetrical form. "It has a mid-century influence, contemporary sensibility and a timeless appeal," says architect Vaishali Kamdar. Despite its massive shape and weight—at over 75 kg and a price tag of ₹17.5 lakh—the piece charges the space with a dynamic minimalism. It is a light in its own spotlight.
