

As time went by, Jeh began to realise the cash-burn nature of the airline business. Other problems surfaced, too, including a high attrition rate and postponements to the company's IPO plans. Eventually, following serious differences with his father, Jeh exited the company in 2021, taking the brand Go Air with him.

"But even while helming the company, he had already started scouting for a buyer, with feelers sent to potential investors as early as 2019," says a Wadia group insider who was privy to the discussions. "The list included the promoter of one of the country's largest conglomerates. However, the deal couldn't take off. But the search for a suitor continues to date." Following Jeh's departure, the airline was subsequently renamed Go First and positioned as the country's first ultra-low-cost carrier (ULCC). "The classification of Go First as a ULCC was inaccurate. Until the time it suspended operations, it continued to be a LCC even though it did not have the lowest cost base in the industry," states an aviation consultant requesting anonymity.

The airline would be hoping to make a comeback, utilising the breather provided by NCLT's moratorium on its financial obligations and transfer of assets to enable it to work out a restructuring plan. After the airline replied to the DGCA notice on flight suspension, the aviation regulator asked it to submit a comprehensive and sustainable revival plan by June 22. "The revival plan once submitted by Go First shall be reviewed for further appropriate action in the matter," says Vikram Dutt, Director General of DGCA in a message to BT. However, industry insiders are apprehensive as carriers that once suspend operations rarely make a comeback. "Go First is history. The best course of action for the airline, its vendors and its lessors would be to gracefully bury the dead, settle the lawsuits and move on," says an industry insider requesting anonymity.

As the situation unfolds, it is the passenger who is the ultimate loser. "The grounding of Go First and the inability of lessors to repossess their airplanes will lead to higher mar-
