

Abhishek Agrawal

Executive Director, MDRA
(Marketing & Development
Research Associates)

122 |

Management education comes in many variations—MBA, PGDM, online courses and anything that can be marketed

Too Many, Yet Too Few

There is a wide range of management courses, but the actual number of programmes of worth is quite low

ILLUSTRATION BY RAJ VERMA

MANAGEMENT EDUCATION IS being commoditised at an unprecedented pace. A majority of those who seek admission to management programmes belong to Generation Z and they define career success differently. They look for more flexible, shorter courses that offer tangible skills and personal growth. Modern management education comes in many variations—MBA, PGDM, Executive MBA, Online MBA, Specialised MBA and anything that one can imagine and can be marketed. Until the past decade, universities and B-schools were the sole providers of management courses. Now with classroom infrastructure no longer essential, several edtech platforms have collaborated with Indian and global B-schools or universities to offer executive programmes or something distantly related to the traditional full-time programmes.

Out of this, it is important for aspirants to know the fine distinction among these programmes before they make a choice.