the concept of experiential ownership. While traditional ownership still holds sway in India, the winds of change are blowing. “It’s about owning an experience. The younger populace, a demographic deeply entrenched in the digital realm, is propelling India towards electrification,” Dhillon says. Audi’s foray into electric vehicles has found a receptive audience among first-time buyers. He says another trend that’s set to take over is the desire to buy luxury earlier in their lives. That’s visible in the staggering 63 per cent growth Audi’s pre-owned car segment saw in the first nine months of this year.

Quiet luxury, therefore, is not just a status symbol; it’s a lifestyle choice. Agarwal says a lot of it has to do with the changing ethos. “We’re witnessing a shift in perception. Entrepreneurship is now celebrated, and success is rewarded with dreams like owning a Lamborghini. It’s a testament to our evolving society, where achievement is met with a car, which is a lot more personal,” he says.

Describing the kind of meticulous craftsmanship that BMW buyers demand, Pawah says the leather that is used in their cars is not chemically treated but crafted to suit the tastes of its customers. “Even the wood in our cars is recycled, echoing our commitment to sustainability and what our customers want. Luxury is not about excess anymore. It’s about thoughtful design, seamless integration of technology, and a commitment to environmental consciousness,” he adds.

“The future of luxury is here, and it’s dynamic, subtle, and intelligent,” Pawah declares. “It’s not just a revolution in automobiles; it’s a revolution in lifestyle,” he adds.

In this tapestry of change, luxury car brands in India feel that they’re no longer just catching up with global trends; rather, they’re setting new standards as they try to meet the demands of Indian luxury car buyers, who certainly want more than that old bling. BT
