

founders or collaboratively establishing their funds is also a prevalent practice,” remarks Saigal.

PASSION OF THE RICH

Increasingly, young billionaires are turning towards non-traditional “passion” investments that comprise collectible assets like fine art, vintage cars, yachts, and wine. These investments, while providing aesthetic and emotional satisfaction, also have the potential to yield impressive returns.

Art, though not a mainstream spending avenue, does interest a segment of young UHNIs.

Nikhil Kamath, the 37-year-old Co-founder of discount stock broker Zerodha and wealth management company True Beacon, believes Indian art will substantially appreciate in the years to come. He is actively researching this segment as an asset class and is particularly optimistic about the potential of acquiring works by acclaimed artists like F.N. Souza, Tyeb Mehta, or S.H. Raza, which he sees as having significant upside.

“Young billionaires enjoy art, and many of them are buying art to enjoy it, while few are looking at it as an investment avenue. But it turns out to be an excellent investment option, and the prices of works of art by Indian artists have gone up as there is a huge demand out there,” says Himanshu Kohli, Co-founder of Client Associates, a Gurugram-based private wealth management firm.

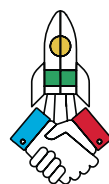

Having said that, in what is perhaps a reflection of their age and social consciousness, impact investing and strategic philanthropy have also joined the conversation. Adds Sapna Narang, Managing Partner at Capital League, a Gurugram-based all-women boutique wealth management firm, “Discussions around impact investing and strategic philanthropy are also on the rise, with some individuals discussing aligning their social and environmental goals with their investment objectives.”
