and do not have the scale,” she said, adding this gap could be fixed with policies that encourage small firms.

And while scale may be an issue for many small Indian firms, a leading executive of the Indian software industry, a sector that enjoys global scale and reach, says the perception about India has definitely changed.

“The reality is that many years ago when the Narendra Modi administration came to power, an Indian delegation led by the late finance minister Arun Jaitley came to Davos. People did not take him seriously. Today, the same set of people know India will grow at 8-9 per cent versus the world at 3 per cent,” is how C.P. Gurnani, CEO and Managing Director of Tech Mahindra, puts it. A week later, data proved his point—India has emerged as the fastest-growing major economy in the world, with the country’s GDP growing at 8.7 per cent in FY22.

It is data such as this that gives the Modi government confidence that India will attract even more foreign investment and convince the world that they should invest in the country.

“India is the future. Most parts of the world today recognise the policies of the government for a country of a billion-plus people. We provide the world’s greatest opportunity,” summed up Goyal.

The global elite will return to Davos next January, as the Forum resets its calendar to the time-tested annual ritual of brainstorming in a small alpine town covered under snow.

Hopefully, the early winter that has set in on the global economy would have thawed by then. BT
